

SOCIOLOGY (SOC) MAJOR

What you will study

The sociology program is organized by different threads or dimensions:

- First are foundational courses that give you a basic overview of the field and some initial experience applying sociological ideas to work on specific features of our way of life. Here you see how sociology applies in all facets of human experience, from figuring out how people act and think online to how people from different social classes or cultural groups see each other. Some courses you take are Introduction to Social Science, Working in Diverse Groups, and Social Movements and Social Change.
- Next is the core in social systems. Some of the most important forces shaping how a society works are the society's economic and political systems. Because these are so central to what happens in society, you need to learn a lot about them. You are concerned about how people make their livings, where our economy is heading, who gets elected to office, and why political decisions are made. Courses here include American Politics and Economic Environment, Race and Ethnicity in American Life, and Social Theory.
- You also focus a great deal on research and practice in the discipline. Sociology emphasizes the use of valid and reliable data to inform its discussions: this is a big part of what makes a sociologist different from others who may have social concerns but are not as aware of the facts needed to explore them carefully. You take courses in Behavioral Science Research Methods and Probability and Statistics, employing the latest computer technologies. You can even learn how to use data to create geographic maps to help others understand social trends, like crime rates, voting patterns, and changing attitudes and values. In various courses you learn interviewing skills. You also do a mentored internship at a site related to the discipline and your career goals, where you can practice using your sociological observation and analytical skills to meet your internship learning goals and gain experience in seeing how to apply sociology in the workplace. You also learn how to translate your sociological skills into running programs to tackle social issues, through courses like Fundraising and Grant Writing or Program Evaluation. The Alverno research and practice curriculum is very strong and often helps graduates get jobs or enter graduate school.
- You take a variety of topic courses that you choose to enhance your individual interests. You choose the ones most interesting to you and most relevant to your life. Some courses from which to choose are The Family, Criminology, Case Management, Comparative Politics, Cross-Cultural Social Psychology, and several others.

SOC-341	Geographical Information Systems	3
SOC-301	Social Theory	4
SOC-306	Race & Ethnicity in American Life	4
SOC-320	Families and Society	4
or SOC-321	Criminology & Social Justice
INTERN-383	Internship Seminar	2
SOC Elective	Sociology (SOC) Elective, 300 or 400 level	6
SOC-491	Advanced Seminar in Sociology	2

Requirements

Code	Title	Credits
Intermediate Requirements
SOC-220	Mobilizing for Justice	4
BSC-255	Behavioral Science Research Methods	4
BSC-256	Probability & Statistics	4
MGT-210	Macroeconomics	3
POL-225	American Politics	4
SOC-399	Formal Introduction to Advanced Work	0
Advanced Requirements		